'Futile and Dangerous': Cameroon First of 20 African Countries to Roll Out GSK's Malaria Vaccine for Babies

Cameroon kicks off world's first country to routinely vaccinate children against malaria, using a shot that's only 30% effective and doesn't stop transmission.

Cameroon this week became the world's first country to routinely vaccinate children against malaria, using a shot that's only 30% effective and doesn't stop transmission.

The country plans to give the vaccine — known as Mosquirix (RTS,S/AS01) — to about 250,000 children by the end of 2025. The GlaxoSmithKline-produced shot, recommended by the World Health Organization (WHO), requires four doses and provides protection against severe illness caused by one type of malaria parasite.

Protection wanes over several months.

The first dose is given at age 5 months, with an injection into the baby's thigh. The second and third doses are given one and two months after the first injection, respectively. The fourth dose is given over a year later.

Dr. Paul Thomas — a retired pediatrician who grew up in Africa — said eradicating malaria was a "worthy goal" but that this vaccine was "sure to fail."

"You cannot eliminate malaria with a vaccine that does not prevent transmission and is only 30% effective," Thomas told The Defender. "Even Bill Gates — who loves vaccines and whose Gavi [the Vaccine Alliance] organization was behind the development of this vaccine — does not support this program."

This vaccine will "clearly not protect or improve children's health," Thomas said. "The rollout is a futile and dangerous project that I feel strongly should be relegated to the scrap heap of failed ideas and boondoggles."

Shabnam Patwa Mohamed, executive director of Children's Health Defense (CHD) Africa, agreed, telling The Defender, "As an African, I am once again horrified at the colonialism of Africa through Big Pharma, endorsed by the World Health Organization."

Mohamed pointed out that Mosquirix does not meet the WHO's goal of having licensed malaria vaccines with efficacies of at least 75% by the year 2030. She said:

> "There is credible evidence to suggest that clean water and good sanitation, as well as meticulous bite avoidance and hygiene practices, have made a 4-million children death difference in treating malaria.
>
> "The African public and ethical leaders should take back health and sovereignty together."

After initially paying more than $200 million to test the vaccine, the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation in July 2022 withdrew financial support because the shot had "a much lower efficacy than we would like," Mary Wetherall, the Gates Foundation's director of malaria programs, told The Associated Press.

Although the Gates Foundation no longer funds the shot, it still funds Gavi, the organization providing the shot "free of charge" in Cameroon.

Roughly 13 other African countries plan to follow Cameroon's lead by introducing the vaccine this year. With Gavi's help, those nations will receive more than 4 million children through 2025, Gavi told NBC News.

Aurelia Nguyen, Gavi's chief program officer, said, "The vaccination will save lives. It will provide major relief to families and the country's health system."

Clinical trials showed doubled female mortality

According to the package insert, Mosquirix's clinical trials showed kids who received three doses of the vaccine were more likely to die monopoly.

> "In clinical studies, meningitis (any aetiology) has been reported more frequently in the group vaccinated with three doses of Mosquirix up to 20 months post dose 1 (27 cases out of 11,439 vaccinees) compared with the control group (4 cases out of 5,096 vaccinees). A causal relationship to the vaccine has not been established."

The control group for the Phase 3 trials was given a "comparator vaccine." The Lancet reported, but the report did not say what kind. A comparator is a specific drug … with a similar indication and formulation to the treatment of interest."

But the package insert failed to mention that the Phase 3 trials also found increased risk of cerebral malaria and doubled female mortality, as reported by Aletia.

Participants reported fever (27%), irritability (14%) and pain (16%) or swelling (7%) at the injection site after the third dose. Others (less than 10%) had more than 1%0 reported diarrhea and decreased appetite.

A small fraction (0.1%) of trial participants fell into a febrile seizure within a week after getting one of the shots.

Moreover, a seven-year follow-up in children who participated in the Phase 2 trial shows that the vaccine's efficacy had waned over time and that there was a rebound effect later on, especially in areas prone to malaria.

WHO's earlier pilot lacked informed consent

Mohamed pointed out that in an earlier pilot of the vaccine rolled out in Malawi, Ghana and Kenya, which she described as an informed consent disaster, the WHO committed a "serious breach" of international ethical standards by failing to get informed consent from parents.

The WHO also failed to monitor adverse events, she told The Defender.

The BMJ said the WHO's randomized study involved 720,000 children, adding:

> "WHO says the study is a 'pilot introduction' and not a 'research activity' — and that those children living in areas randomized to receive the new vaccine will do so as part of each country's routine vaccination schedule and that consent is implied.
>
> "An implied consent process means that recipients of the vaccine are not being informed that they are in a study.
> "Instead, WHO says that information on vaccination is provided to the communities through existing public health tools and community outreach — activities that rely on parents who present for vaccination to do with the option to vaccinate their children or not.
>
> "But Charles Weijer, a bioethicist at Western University in Canada, told The BMJ that the failure to obtain informed consent from parents whose children are taking part in the study violates the Ottawa Statement, a consensus statement on the ethics of cluster randomized trials."

The vaccine's active substance is made up of proteins found in Plasmodium falciparum parasites and the hepatitis B virus. Adjuvants, which help the shot work, are also included.

Upon vaccination, the child's immune system is expected to recognize the proteins from the parasite and virus and trigger and make antibodies against them.

Plasmodium falciparum parasites are commonly transmitted to mosquitoes.

More than 90% of all malaria cases occur in sub-Saharan Africa, according to the WHO. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention estimated 90% of deaths due to malaria are in sub-Saharan Africa and that most of these deaths occur in children under 5 years of age.

The Gates Foundation co-founded Gavi and is one of its four permanent board members. UNICEF, the World Bank and the WHO — whose second-largest donor is Gates — hold the other permanent seats.

The Clinton Health Access Initiative also sits on Gavi's board. The initiative last year teamed up with the Gates Foundation and the WHO to launch "The Big Catch-Up," which they called the "largest childhood immunization effort ever."

Mohamed recommended that teenagers, parents and communities watch the CHD co-produced film "Infertility: A Diabolical Agenda" to better understand and resist Big Pharma and the WHO's agenda for African and international health. In this compelling film, Dr. Stephen Karanja warns, "When they're through with Africa, they're coming for you."

This article has been updated to include Shabnam Patwa Mohamed's recommendation on how communities can learn more about the WHO's agenda in Africa.

This is such a sad development. It's yet another example of Africa being a dumping ground for medical experimentation. I know for all of the children who will be injured and who will die as a result of the terrible vaccine program. Unfortunately, the desire of many African countries to "catch up" with the West and be "modern" will likely lead to the acceptance of this dangerous vaccine program. I hope that I am wrong, but I don't think that happening across the globe in quick and starts, a backwash will ultimately happen once the true extent of injuries from these shots becomes known, but too many will be sacrificed in the process.

Remember that Ivermectin is a treatment for malaria. That's why they tried to discredit it globally.

STOP! STOP! STOP!
Please stop this shit!
The African nations are not banking grounds for new medications nor are they the dumping ground for unwanted, out of date medications that other countries have declined.
Africa has the right to be healthy. It has the right to live a healthy life as the next man woman and child.
STOP this outrageous behaviour!!!

Cameron actually surprised. Have you'll forgotten our own forced "Shots" on children. The Defense Act kept the way, and the runaway train isn't stopping. Our knowledge of corruption hasn't changed anything. Instead we allow oligarchs to control our entire country. Never thought I'd live to see this.

"Ghana and Kenya, which she described as an informed consent disaster, the WHO committed a "serious breach" of international ethical standards by failing to give informed consent to those involved, according to another BMJ report."
Not the WHO wants countries to sign on to a Pandemic Treaty which puts them in charge of a global response.
Ghana and Kenya are not the Monkeypox scare, Tedros Dictatorially overrode the commission majority, which voted against not to declare an emergency. Not long after Tedros was Ghana's Foreminister, Monkeypox disappeared from the news.
I know the commission that was correct in their response.

Is this the WHO's idea of equity? I'd like to know why Cameroon is going along with this.

Yes, their "Equity" within the context of the WHO refers to financial equity. In other words, developing nations are to have equal access to biological weapons and the profits they produce. Has nothing to do with health or the population.
It's true, check it out.

I don't see how much the leader of the Cameroons was paid, for him to allow the people he's supposed to be looking after, to be used experimentally to see whether a drug works, and what nasty side effects it might have? It must have been a pretty package.

I remember reading in the book the Real Anthony Fauci, that the WHO, NIH and other experimented with drugs in the Cameroons they considered the people there expendable. I pray the parents wise up and refuse these injections.

Another video link on vanilla-entitled "Red Cross Cured 193 Malaria Cases with RMR: Part 2 Live Documentary Series" in which a doctor from the Red Cross of Chlorine Dioxide (a mixture of sodium chlorite solution with hydrochloric acid) drops it water eliminated the Malaria parasite and cured every person...cost pennies per dose, per 100%.
Why don't you investigate Chlorine Dioxide, Lab to Andreas Kalcker ? I have been talking to her 5 years and have not been vaccinated even though I suffer from COPD, read the book Status Profitella (emerging from Uruguay
